"We're running out of sleeping pills"

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS

An Independent Newspaper Founded January 1, 1876

Bailey K. Howard, President
John C. Tennant, Executive Vice President
Roy M. Fisher, Editor
Darrin M. Fehlandt, Managing Editor
Kenneth Metcalfe, Associate Editor
William F. Swan, Town Souvenir
Ira Yates, Circulation

Mahdi Fadl, President
Ernest Poole, Vice Pres., Editorial Director
Sigrid Mortensen, Vice Pres., General Manager
Cole Joseph, Vice Pres., Advertising-Marketing
Hy Shannon, Vice Pres., Production
Albert K. von Hoffman, Vice Pres., Circulation

Winner of 11 Pulitzer Prizes for Meritorious Public Service and Excellence
Editorial Board: Paul Gapp, Chairman, Chief Editorial Writer; Gary Robinhold, Hoke Norris, Myron Beckenstein, John Fischetti, Sydney J. Harris

Sections: Crisis in the kitchen

Once again the threat of a strike hangs over Chicago's public schools, and it is hard to find even a glimmer of hope that this latest in a long string of crises can be stalled off. The Board of Education is in a position somewhat like that of a family head who has mortgaged everything down to the kitchen sink and finally sees the creditors closing in.

The Chicago Teachers Union has presented a list of demands the board cannot possibly meet. Some of the demands are unrealistic or even outrageous, but the main thing is down the same track the board would like to follow—general upgrading of the quality of education with a salary scale reflecting that upgrading.

Yet the board, by overreaching its resources in past union settlements, has come to the point where it is imposing cutbacks instead of advances in order to keep its budget approximate near a balance. From such a head-on confrontation no good can result in a long and futile strike with the children of Chicago the victims.

The frustration of the teachers is understandable. Why should they and still or perhaps even worse other salaried groups are making solid gains? Yet the board is unable to make the magic that will produce the needed money. This is no case of raising the price of the product in order to raise wages; the yardsticks of "productivity" do not apply.

Nor is this a case of a possible shutdown in the production of a certain article of commerce. What is being talked about is the possible closure of a most vital service in our society—the schools. The responsibility to keep that service going lies heavily on all parties to the dispute.

It is not responsible to say, as some union spokesmen have said, that the board should grant the teachers' demands, regardless of cost, through June and close the schools in September if the collapse falls to come across with the cash. Public policy must not be made by blackmail. Nor is it responsible to assume, as some recent decisions seem to be doing, that the avenues of revenue have been exhausted.

Instead of squaring off against each other, the teachers and the board should be working together to explore new ideas and to persuade the legislature and the public at large that their plans for education are worthy of greater support. Far in the red ink they may seem and decide what value is to be put on the schools.

Given a generation or two both sides to work through to a better deal for the schools, the crisis might still be resolved. And neither side dares forget that it is tampering with the welfare of the city's most priceless asset—its children.

Back to the China talks

The resumption of Warsaw talks between the United States and China can be viewed as a hopeful sign that other areas for prospectively endless jawing between parties holding totally irreconcilable viewpoints. Paris, as one such theater, has already witnessed its share of frustration.

And yet the agreement for the Warsaw sessions was reached only in summer June. 20 after a two-year suspension is a hopeful development. There have been changes.

In the past two years the United States has had a change in administration; the Nixon administration has committed itself to ending the Vietnam War; mainland China's spokesmen have indicated a desire to ease the friction with the United States; and China into the community of nations.

For its part China has been resuming relations with Russia and mounting strains at home. It has also witnessed an easing of tensions between Russia and the United States, to China's own immediate discomfiture.

Each nation, beset by its own set of social and economic problems, needs time and the chance to concentrate on those problems. Each side would benefit from more normalized relations and open communication with the other.

When Peking abruptly cancelled the resumption of meetings scheduled for February the United States had been on the verge of proposing a number of steps aimed at improving those relations. Since then President Nixon has taken some unilateral steps to unlock trade and travel between the two countries.

Perhaps China is now ready to resume these matters, even to take a step or two toward greater openness. Even a very small step would be heartening.

The shock of hunger

One of the problems in combating hunger is the difficulty of making affluent people believe that there are some other people are hungry. That gap can be bridged if the unhungry will take time to see a program that will be broadcast by Channel 11.

"To Feed the Hungry" will be broadcast Monday through Friday nights (and Saturday and Sunday and Friday by recuns of "Town Meeting: Who's Hungry in Chicago?" which originated early in December). The repetitions should give everybody an opportunity to see it, and everybody should. It investigates Mayor Daley's claim that "there is no need for anyone being hungry in Chicago," examines the successes and failures of attempts to feed the hungry, and recommends some necessary changes.

Most important, it goes into the slums and into the homes of the hungry to prove that some people simply can't afford enough to eat. It is a shocking revelation, though it could not be otherwise. Hunger should be disturbing and shocking too.

Rockets: a game of sleeping pills

If any new evidence were needed of the proliferating nature of defense costs it could be found in the proposal for mobile "garages" for Minuteman missiles.

As part of a fundamental missile protection system already costing billions of dollars, the Minuteman would be in its concrete and steel launching silo —the Minuteman in its silo.

Now the Pentagon is worried lest increasing accuracy enable an enemy to vector right in on the missiles before they can be got off the ground.

The proposed solution is to have five silos built around the central silo, each a mile from the hub and connected with a concrete tunnel, so that an enemy thus could not tell which of six silos the Minuteman was in at any given time, besides which the few minutes of radar warning time could enable the military to shift the missile from one silo to another after the attack had been launched.

We don't know what all this would cost, but nothing in the missile program ever comes cheaply. Billions of nine zeros, plus inflation and cost overruns.

And no end is in sight. One offensive or defensive weapon development prompts a counterreaction; the missile brought the antimissile missile, and the ABM brought the MIRV, descendant of the MIRV. If security could be reached by some other road, and the billions invested in arms race instead, who is an explosion that could touch off in the quality of human life!

Police state happen here? It did

With the killings of the Black Panthers in Chicago, the right of dissent seemingly in danger in the trial of the Conspiracy 7, and with proposed legislation like the omnibus internal security act under serious consideration, the terrors of a police state are being brought more sharply into focus than ever before in the history of our country.

What makes this even more frightening is the prospect of a silent mass assent to the forces intent to act until it is too late.

In 1941 I was a young boy of 4 living in Seattle. America had recently declared war on Japan after the attack on Pearl Harbor and although my parents were concerned by the declaration, they were not greatly worried. My mother was a Japanese born in America, my father had lived in the U.S. over 20 years and had graduated from an American university.

Then on Feb. 19, 1942, President Franklin Roosevelt issued Executive Order 9066 which in effect imprisoned my mother and parents, along with 110,000 other Japanese Americans, in concentration camps. This was done without being accused of a crime, with no right of appeal, without any of the due processes of law guaranteed to all Americans.

We served our out sentence silently and only in retrospect do some of us view it with bitterness.

I was too young then to understand what was happening but instead remained silent. To me and my parents, but now I am older and I ask my parents, and those who lived through that time and who were fortunate enough to act, why they did not protest the injustice.

Why did so few speak out in defense, set so much for so little, not for the very principles of democracy for which we were then engaged in a war to defend?

The one clear answer that I can find is that through the rhetoric and rationalized polemics is that those who would have spoken up for us, those who should have resisted, those whose voices in protest did not do so, are backing our President and stand a better way. Perhaps they have been a vision or hope that things can be or should be better.

But now they are speaking out. It is up to the whole world to listen and understand what they say.

Now with so much affluence, especially in our country, this great country of great hope that there will be enough to share. So that all can be adequately fed, housed and educated—and thought well of by all mankind, for humanity is what we live for what they are—human beings.

Chicago NITA HINELY

Yesterday's silent majority now speaking

When one stops to think about it, there is perhaps another silent majority, which has been silent much too long, considering the growth of time mankind has been in existence.

These silent majorities include all of the poverty stricken peoples of the Earth, all group discriminated against, all the children and students who have been shortchanged in their good education and environment, and women. I could go on.

Too long have these groups remained silent, perhaps not being aware of the tools they really do have. But we have been engaged in the grind of daily living to have time for those extras of life in order to develop backing the policies of our leaders in the Vietnam War, for example.

I do not believe that a majority of the American people, a minority silent or otherwise would support the policies of those who are using bombs and napalm to burn, blast and blow away one by one, letting my country be sacrificed by foolish, wealthy, incendiary leaders.

I realize that we are a people that dislike, in fact, hate to be humble, have to be involved, have to be heard, and we generally allow ourselves to be manipulated by those who feel that we do not condone or approve of what they do and take the time to think a little. It's time we realize that we expect to have any young men sent, and protected, all in the world and any rights that our forefathers were so careful to make provision for so many years ago.

Our image in the eyes of the world is shattered, and we are sorry. We don't practice what we preach. We try to tell other countries that they should be democratic and that we are the around the world and earn our note to where we are wanted.

I love this country of ours, and I have helped fight for it, too, but really we have to be one standard for the U.S. and another for other countries, because most of the others are at least intelligent enough to see that we aren't what we say we are.

Let's, bring our boys home, and not, let them fight for our own doorstep closest first and then work out from there. The people's efforts and perhaps one day when we might dare to do what is right by all then we can be proud of what we have now lost.

Chicago M.K.

'Protest-it may help'

Ernest Fitzgerald, accepting thanks for being an outspoken job-worth-keeper for taxpayers. I am writing my congressman about the proposed dismissal. The Pentagon evidently has more money than you may uncover other campaign contributions.

When will the rest of the country understand that our economy and our ability to defend ourselves depends on a healthy economy? Protest—it may help.

Chicago R. Y.

Your views of the news

Today, the premium which we place on silence is the highest in our nation. Without silence, there would be no Vietnam, no Chicago, no dreadfully silence now is the highest in our country. Just a few lines from one of your readers, one of the silent majority that is tired of reading about protests.

I am led to believe from what I read in the papers and hear on the news that the great silent majority of silent Americans are backing our President and stand a better way. Perhaps they have been a vision or hope that things can be or should be better.

But now they are speaking out. It is up to the whole world to listen and understand what they say.

Now with so much affluence, especially in our country, this great country of great hope that there will be enough to share. So that all can be adequately fed, housed and educated—and thought well of by all mankind, for humanity is what we live for what they are—human beings.

Chicago NITA HINELY

The peril of being able to see the future

On the morning of the last day of 1969, at the decadent decade end, I awoke looking and with the peril my eyes to unsight whether or not it had been for me a good decade.

I weighed the good things that had happened to me against the bad, and finally concluded that on the morning of Jan. 1, 1969, when the alarm went off, I should have reset it for Jan. 1, 1970, rolled over, and burrowed my head back in sleep and slept the 10 years through.

If I had been so lucky I would to have done that. I would have been just as close to reaching the goals I had set for myself that day I am to reaching today's goals, and I would have gotten myself into a lot less trouble and would've gotten more rest in the process.

I don't mean to be pessimistic; just honest. I think it all of us need more of the little in such a personal sense, a full half of the human race would likewise opt to go back and sleep the decade through.

Perhaps we would be happy, with few exceptions, we are permitted to look back to see forward in time. Some of us were able to foretell what the future held for us, the shifter of the tides, and perhaps the hope that gave us out of hot.

Chicago ROB DALLACH

The future may not be

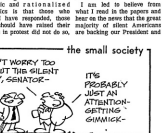
Arthur J. Snider joins a growing phalanx of the technological blessings that the 1970s will bring. But has he given serious thought to the probable social consequences of people with the "blessings"?

The basic problem is that as our society becomes more and more tightly organized and technological, the power to make the decisions that influence the daily life of each individual becomes more and more concentrated in the hands of scientists and those who hire them. The individual has less and less ability to make the important decisions for himself and choose his own style of living.

I would not be for public use data, even from a strictly materialistic viewpoint, many scientists do. I would not be for use of any data in that direction — what an explosion that could touch off in the quality of human life!

Today, the premium which we place on silence is the highest in our nation. Without silence, there would be no Vietnam, no Chicago, no dreadfully silence now is the highest in our country. Just a few lines from one of your readers, one of the silent majority that is tired of reading about protests.

I am led to believe from what I read in the papers and hear on the news that the great silent majority of silent Americans are backing our President and



Sports: a trillion

The Carl T. Rowan

WASHINGTON—In some quarters of government they are saying that during the 1970s we will spend a trillion (thirty a thousand billion) dollars, public and private, to rebuild America's cities.

It seems hard to believe we Americans will really spend more that kind of money to positive programs of human betterment, even if we do, it is difficult to believe that we shall really revitalize our cities.

I have been reading Robert Burley's remarkable book on "Poverty and Mental Retardation" which Random House will publish in six weeks or and I am screedfully reminded of the real challenge that ways we avoid them. I am reminded that:

●Poor, culturally deprived children comprise the cutbright of this nation's mentally, provided poverty.

●Some experts estimate that the nation's largest single one child in every two is culturally deprived and probably the victim of some degree of psychosocial retardation.

●A major cause of suppressed mental retardation of the poor is malnutrition, a fact well documented most convincingly by Burley.

The school lunch program was begun in 1946 to provide a hot, balanced midday meal for hungry, poor children. But the Agriculture Department, which runs the program, says that only about 20,000,000 of Rowan 32,000,000 school children (under age 18) are served a school lunch on an average day.

An estimated 8,000,000 of the children come from families too poor to pay the cost of a school lunch, but only 3,000,000 of the 8,000,000 are given a free or reduced price lunch.

Burley Reports in the last two years reveal a shocking picture of inadequate financing, maladministration, politics, discrimination and lack of facilities.

A comprehensive study made by five national women's organizations in 1968 proved that the lack of enforcement of national standards, coupled with totally inadequate financing, resulted in a patchwork pattern for determining need.

A child could be eligible for free lunches in one district but not in another, in a neighboring school. One program is a patchwork of 1,000 different eligibility standards in 1,000 different jurisdictions.

Compared to using the millions of dollars especially appropriated to supply free and reduced-price lunches to needy children, most states appear to have used the funds to hold down the cost of their own school lunch programs. Thus, the states have benefited indirectly from a program intended to bring a special effort to provide an adequate diet for the poor.

Lack of facilities is another problem. Only 10,000 elementary schools with 10,000,000 students have cafeterias (of the 60,000 elementary grades) have enough space for a cafeteria. Too often these are older schools in the inner cities or poor rural schools — the very schools with the highest concentrations of poor children.

Lack of money is also fallen short in many places because of the inadequate facilities. Children who get the free or reduced-price lunches are often publicly identified (by different lines, different tickets, the calling of their names) and made to feel the stigma of poverty.

WE CAN SPEND billions on the brick and mortar, the livelihood and the education of our cities. But we shall remain in trouble as long as the emotional achievements of large portions of our population are limited by hunger-induced retardation.

A good place to start spending is on the school lunch program, the worldwide school lunch program, which Burley estimates is feeding the 5,000,000 children who have the food they most presumably are getting nothing.

The key to our cities inevitably must be the people who live in them. Ultimately the mass of things must be done to make the people, not the outlooks of those residents, more productive. We are in a tertious food each day for millions of our people, indeceptively fundamental and inexpensive way to begin to open doors to other areas of progress.

Protest-it may help

Ernest Fitzgerald, accepting thanks for being an outspoken job-worth-keeper for taxpayers. I am writing my congressman about the proposed dismissal. The Pentagon evidently has more money than you may uncover other campaign contributions.

When will the rest of the country understand that our economy and our ability to defend ourselves depends on a healthy economy? Protest—it may help.

Chicago R. Y